Against intellect

emocracies are facing an unprecedented threat of der the rapid rise of populist, right-wing, and majoritarian ethno-nationalist movements, the concepts of 'fact' and 'truth' have taken a sustained beating as have science and expertise in various domains — academics, journalism, films, and so on. Anti-intellectualism or the 'generalised distrust of experts and intellectuals' has, thus, become the norm.

India is no exception to this.

Under this Hindu nationalist government, established notions of scholarship and expertise have been subject to populist attacks in fields ranging from science to history. Thus, we have claims of ancient India possessing such technologies as plastic surgery, the internet, stem cell therapy and the aeroplane. Such claims have been made by high State functionaries. Apparently, what matters is only majoritarian 'opinion' and 'belief'; not knowledge claims accepted through universally established protocols. This is best illustrated by Narendra Modi's sarcastic comment that "hard work is more powerful than Harvard" (in the context of Amartya Ŝen's criticism of demonetisation).

This anti-intellectualism becomes even more drastic when it is Western expertise that subjects India to scrutiny. Whether it is the BBC documentary on Gujarat 2002, The New York Times' coverage of Covid19, The Lancet's research on excess coronavirus deaths or V-Dem Institute's reports on the decline in democracy's indicators, the response is a scathing dismissal of the credibility of these institutions. More worryingly, these criticisms are seen as part of a 'Western propaganda' or a 'colonial mindset' targeting the whole of India. Facts and truth in themselves have no place in the discourse when political populism and its minders take over the function of determining what knowledge is, this time under the guise of countering Western colonialism. It does not matter that the BBC is among the most trusted news sources in the world or that The New York Times pursues the highest standards in journalism. This is not to suggest that these reputed institutions cannot make mistakes or are free of typical Western biases. What is revealing is that their claims are not refuted on the basis of reasoning and supporting evidence. Instead, the response always is that there is a grand conspiracy by a Western cabal against India. This universe of 'alternative facts' must also ignore history. The BBC played a stellar role in bringing the truth of the India-Pakistan war of 1971. It must also ignore expertise, like that of the acclaimed Israeli filmmaker, Nadav Lapid, who had described The Kashmir Files as "vulgar propaganda".

Will China's new premier Li Qiang deliver on the economy?

President Xi Jinping named Li Qiang, a close confidant, as the country's next Premier, nominally in charge of the world's second-largest economy, now facing some of its worst prospects in years. He takes on the job even as the authority of the Premier and the State Council, China's Cabinet, has been steadily eroded by Xi as he shifts more powers to bodies directly under the ruling Communist Party.

Qiang Li is known for overseeing Shanghai's harsh COVID-19 lockdown, which had major economic consequences. His promotion shows that loyalty to Xi now seems to matter more than competence in economic governance. Moreover, unlike previous Premiers, Li has had never held office at the national level before being elected to the Chinese Communist Party's top leadership. Questions are being raised over his experience in running China's vast economy, given that he skipped the traditional intermediary step of serving a term as Vice Premier before becoming Pre-

Chinese Premiers have traditionally been in charge of the Chinese economy, but this position has been weakened under Xi, who centralized power over the past decade. As Premier, Li oversees the State Council, Xi has deprived him of substantive powers by, for example, strengthening the party's Central Committee for Financial and Economic Af-

Many overseas analysts believe that Li, who was Xi's de facto chief of staff in Zhejiang province from 2004-07, will mainly play the role of implementer, rather than be tasked with reshaping the country's development

In the long run, few expect Li to be able to resurrect the strong reformist premierships of the past, such as those of Wen Jiabao under Xi's predecessor Hu Jintao, or Zhu Rongji under the late president Jiang Zemin.

Xi, ever careful about his position at the head of the party, is expected to keep Li on a tight rein. The potential for unpredictability is going to remain a chronic risk with Xi in charge and especially with a leadership team comprised entirely of his allies. China's economy grew just 3 per cent last year, and on the opening day of the NPC, the Government set a modest growth target of about 5 per cent for 2023, its lowest goal in nearly three decades. Li's top task this year will be beating that target without triggering serious inflation or piling on debt. While China leash stimulus to jump-start growth, potential setbacks such as a collapse in exports or persistent weakness in the property sector could force Li's hand. Li can make some repairs here and there, but he is not expected to tear down the wall and build something new. It is unlikely that Li Qiang would serve as a counterweight to Xi's efforts to control the economy.

It is very doubtful whether Li himself will have the authority to further develop Deng Xiaoping's reform and open door policy, the decades-long process of opening up that has appeared to be threatened under Xi. Historically, Li has shown himself to be a pragmatist with a strong business-ori-ented mindset.

Still, his relatively low profile until recently has left the market scrambling for signs or indications of how he would manage far more sophisticated domestic issues while countering US decoupling pressure at the centralgovernment level.

Questions remain over how he is likely to reconcile his policies with Xi's longterm targets of self-reliance and shared prosperity, and how far he could push the reform of the fast-ageing and debt-ridden economy to bring back sustainable growth in the face of external headwinds.

All eyes would be on how Li will shape the economic policy as the economy navigates a growing array of challenges, including sluggish consumption, rising unemployment, a downturn in the housing market, lack of business confidence, local governments' debt distress, an ageing population and increasing tension with the US over technology sanctions. In addition to lingering economic headaches, he will face an urgent need to prevent overseas orders from falling, while also considering contingency plans if relations keep deteriorating with some of China's top export destinations and sources of Xi's new term and the appointment of loyalists to top posts underscores his neartotal monopoly on Chinese political power, eliminating any potential opposition to his hyper-nationalistic agenda of building China into the top political, military and economic rival to the US and the chief authoritarian challenge to the Washington-led democratic world order.

Dim lights before bedtime to reduce risk of gestational diabetes regnant should dim the lights in their home and turn off or at least dim their screens (computer monitors and smartphones) a few hours berisk of gestational diabetes mellitus, a new Northwestern Medicine study Women who developed gestational diabetes mellitus in the multi-site study had greater light exposure in the three hours before sleep onset. They did not differ in their light exposure during daytime or sleep or in their activity levels compared to those who did not develop it.

"Our study suggests that light exposure before bedtime may be an underrecognized yet easily modifiable risk factor of gestational diabetes," said lead study author Dr. Minjee Kim, assistant professor of neurology at Northwestern University Feinberg School of Medicine and a Northwestern Medicine neurologist. Growing evidence suggests exposure to light at night before bedtime may be linked to impaired glucose regulain non-pregnant adults. However, little is known about the effect of evening light exposure during pregnancy on the risk of developing gestational diabetes, a common pregnancy complication with significant health implications for both mother and offspring. This is believed to be one of the first multi-site studies to examine light exposure before sleep on the risk of developing gestational diabetes. The study was published on March 10 in the American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology Maternal Fetal Medicine.

Gestational diabetes rise is 'alarming' Gestational diabetes is on the rise in the U.S. and globally. About 4.5% of first-time pregnant women with a baby born between 2011 and 2013 developed gestational diabetes, which has been increasing on average 3.4% per threeyear period until 2019. In 2020, the rate of gestational diabetes was 7.8% of all births in the U.S. "It's alarming," Kim said. "Gestational diabetes is known to increase obstetric complications.

Abduction, forced conversion of Hindu girls continues in Pakistan to sign and submit a sworn affidavit addressed to Senior Superintendent of Police (SSP) and Deputy Commissioner (DC) Mirpur Khas, claiming that she converted to Islam on her free will and was not pressurized or forced to do so.

In another incident of a Hindu minor girl being kidnapped and police refusing to register a case, Veero Kolhia resident of Talho Malho village of Umerkot said that his minor daughter was abducted by influential people of his village by giving her some soft drinks laced with in-

He further said that despite repeated pleas, police refused to register a missing case. Three other cases of kidnapping and forced conversions of minor Hindu girls were reported in March 2023. While Meena Butt (14) was kidnapped from near her home in Mavomehhwar, Mirpurkhas and married to kidnapper Abdur after conversion at Barchundi Sharif Dargah (Gotki), Sangita Kumari (16) of Karachi was married to her kidnapper after being forced to embrace Islam at Karachi's Sufi Darbar. Krishna Bheel boyfriend, said her father Dasram Bheel.

> Meanwhile, on Monday, more than 100 social activists from different districts of Pakistan's Sindh and Punjab provinces protested against the kidnapping and forced conversions of minor girls from minority, especially Hindu communities, in an event titled "Aurat" organized in Karachi. Several activists during the event talked about atrocities against women and the apathy shown by the government authorities towards such incidents. The speakers claimed that while police authorities refuse to file FIRs in kidnapping cases, medical and legal authorities connive to declare underage girls as major and eligible for marriage. Karachi-based activist Birma Jeswani said that such incidents of kidnapping of minors, declaring them as major and then forced conversion have been rampant in Sindh for more than a decade and called for an immediate end to such incidents.

Brink Of Eternity

In desperate hope I go and search for her in all the corners of my room; I find her not.

My house is small and what once has gone from it can never be regained. But infinite is thy mansion, my lord, and seeking her I have to come to thy door. I stand under the golden canopy of thine evening sky and I lift my eager eyes to thy face. I have come to the brink of eternity from which nothing can vanish ---no hope, no happiness, no vision of a face seen through tears. Oh, dip my emptied life into that ocean, plunge it into the deepest fullness.

Overweight in youth could be a risk factor for blood clot in adult life eing overweight in childhood and in early adulthood increases the risk factors for blood clots later in life, a University of Gothenburg study shows. The study is based on the early BMI history of more than 37,000 men and information about their thrombi, if any, in adulthood.

The association between obesity and blood clots is already established. However, to date it has been unclear how much influence a raised BMI in childhood and puberty exerts. The purpose of the study was to clarify the links between BMI in early life and subsequent thrombi.

Thrombi usually arise in the legs, often starting in a blood vessel in the calf. Swelling, pain and redness are common symptoms. Treated early, clots are seldom dangerous. However, if one breaks loose, is borne to the lungs in the bloodstream, and adheres to the vessel wall there, the resulting "pulmonary embolism" may be life-threatening. The present study comprises 37,672 men in Sweden, born between 1945 and 1961. It is based on information about height, weight, and BMI from the men's records, first from school health care services (at the age of 8 years) and, second, from medical examinations on enrollment in the Armed Services (at age 20), along with register data on any blood clots up to age 62 on average.

Distinctly elevated thrombus risk It emerges from the results, now published in the Journal of Internal Medicine, that BMI at both ages 8 and 20, independently of each other, can be linked to venous blood clots. These may occur in, for example, the leg (deep vein thrombosis, DVT) or the lung (pulmonary embolism).

In adulthood, two groups were found to be at a significantly increased risk of venous thrombi. The first was individuals who had been overweight both as children and as young adults, while the second was composed of those whose weight in childhood was normal and who became overweight only in early adulthood. Moreover, being overweight in both childhood and young adulthood was found to raise the risk of arterial thrombi -- that is, clots resulting from constricted blood vessels with fatty deposits and inflammation. Since there were few cases of arterial blood clots in the study, however, further studies are needed to confirm these

All comparisons in the study were made with the control group, whose weight was normal at both 8 and 20 years of age. Overweight in puberty an important factor The first and corresponding author of the study is Lina Lilja, a doctoral student at Sahlgrenska Academy, University of Gothenburg, and pediatrician.

At the time of the study, she worked at the Kungshojd pediatric clinic in Gothenburg. Today, she is a senior physician in child health care in Region Vastra Gotaland."Our study shows that both overweight in childhood and overweight in young adulthood increase the risk of venous blood clots later in life. The latter, overweight when the men were young adults, proved to be a more influential factor than overweight when they were children," Lilja notes.

Professor and senior physician Claes Ohlsson and associate professor and senior physician Jenny Kindblom, both of Sahlgrenska Academy at the University of Gothenburg and Sahlgrenska University Hospital, were senior authors of the study. "Obesity and overweight during puberty seem to have a marked impact on a person's future risks of venous throm-Kindblom concludes. The study includes data from the BMI Epidemiology Study (BEST) in Gothenburg, a population study, and from Swedish national registers.
